A budget package in December may not be Autumn, but it certainly had a real chill for those least able to afford its consequences. This was a classic Osborne budget statement. Massive real cuts, sugar coated with a few pennies in the form of announcements on the NHS and infrastructure. Scotland will get £129m of Barnett consequentials from the NHS announcements, but this goes nowhere near making up for the real cuts ahead.

Public spending in the UK will be the lowest for 80 years. The Office for Budget Responsibility, said: “Between 2009-10 and 2019-20, spending on public services, administration and grants by central government is projected to fall from 21.2 per cent to 12.6 per cent of GDP and from £5,650 to £3,880 per head in 2014-15 prices. Around 40 per cent of these cuts would have been delivered during this Parliament, with around 60 per cent to come during the next. The implied squeeze on local authority spending is similarly severe.” This is entirely a consequence of the failure of austerity economics. The OBR also tell us that real earnings will not return to pre-crisis levels over the next five years after a continuous fall since the crash. Pay freezes, low paid new jobs, low incomes of the involuntary self-employed are behind the apparently improving unemployment figures. This is the reason why tax revenues have not grown sufficiently, and public borrowing has increased despite draconian public spending cuts. Osborne told us proudly that he has halved the deficit. But in 2010 he told us that it would have gone by next year. Instead he has borrowed more than Labour.

We need a massive programme of public investment in social care, public transport, housing, child care and education, which will tackle the investment and decent work deficit. Then we need labour market policies to ensure that the fall in labour’s share of national income in the past decades is reversed, and the recovery is wage-led rather than debt-led. Household debt will grow faster than previously forecast until it’s larger than before the recession. In simple terms, take care of full employment, decent pay for women and men, equality, and sustainability, and the budget will take care of itself.

If you were in any doubt about the political strategy behind the Autumn Statement its keep the rich on board. The top 10% will vote Tory come what may to protect their tax cuts that are threatened by Labour. The big losers are again at the bottom, the ‘dog end voters in the outlying regions’ as one Tory MP put it. Osborne’s economic policies have been deliberately designed to shift money from the poorest to the richest. Research from the London School of Economics has found that the changes he has introduced to benefits and income tax have seen the poorest five per cent lose income while the top one per cent have gained. Austerity is the Tories cover for their real political goal of reducing the size and role of the state.

The review of shared services in Hammersmith, Fulham and Westminster Kingston and Chelsea shows that sharing is not as easy as its advocates would have us believe.

When Labour took control of Hammersmith and Fulham Borough (LBHF) one of their manifesto commitments was a review of shared services arrangements with the Westminster (WCC) and Kingston and Chelsea (RBKC) authorities. This “critical friend” review has now been published. The report makes key recommendations for improvement around:

- Vision
- Leadership
- Accountability structures
- Governance
- Procurement
- Technology.

What’s interesting from a UNISON perspective is that it contains a survey of staff across the 3 boroughs.

The survey was sent to all staff in LBHF and all staff working in shared services in the other two boroughs (RBKC and WCC). There was a great deal of agreement among staff the key challenges were solving the different processes, technologies and cultures which make shared working difficult and a huge feeling of uncertainty about what the future held.

“Cost savings were the overarching priority”

Uncertainty: most respondents picked “neither agree nor disagree” when asked whether shared services had enabled cost savings and service improvements. It was generally felt that costs savings were the overarching priority for sharing services. LBHF staff felt more strongly than the other boroughs that shared services “does not improve individual borough’s ability to serve own residents”.

Personal development: while staff felt that sharing best practice and working shared teams offered personal development opportunities there were serious levels of concern about job security. This may though be a general, and not unrealistic, concern felt by all workers across local government considering the level of budget cuts they face.

“Enduring variance in terms and conditions”.

Staff are pretty evenly split between those who would like to see more joint working and those who want to see it end, and 16% who didn’t know. Finance and corporate services were most keen to return to single borough operations.

Another issue is the “enduring variance in terms and conditions between and within teams”. This creates “difficult working environment”. The report states that there is a risk that “the good will of staff is being stretched too far”.

The technological issues are significant, there are three IT systems leaving an admin heavy workload this often leads to the recruitment of temporary staff to process transaction backlogs: Hardly the best way to spend money.

As with other shared services projects there are real issues about individual borough accountability and the ability of boroughs to design and deliver on their individual visions for the future of their areas.

The report is of course full of typical business jargon, but if you go past that it highlights the challenges members will face as more of these plans are evolving in Scottish Authorities. It is important that when meeting with managers and elected members that we can highlight what has happened elsewhere to avoid costly mistakes being repeated here.
Happy Days

We generally highlight the more material benefits of joining a union but a US study has found that being a union member actually makes you happy. The study of happiness or life satisfaction is becoming increasingly popular: even the Tories are measuring it. Studies measure both how people say they feel, things they do like laugh and smile and some include asking participants’ friends and family to rate the subjects happiness as well as professional and clinical assessments. UNISON has joined others like Oxfam in campaigning for wider use of these types of measures rather than for example GDP as a measure of a country’s success.

Two American academics have used data from a range of life satisfaction studies to see whether membership of a trade union “contributes to a higher quality of life”. They found that union members are more satisfied with their lives than non members and that the effect of union membership “rivals other common predictors of quality of life”. The researchers give four suggestions as to why: Unions give members a route to influencing how their workplace operates, they have routes to appeal management decisions and processes to deal with problems. Union members are better paid and have more secure employment especially in the US. Unemployment and worry about unemployment are major predictors of poor mental and physical health. Union membership reduces this type of stress and anxiety. Unions provide lots of opportunities to for social interaction. Unions promote active citizenship, there is a growing body of evidence that being active in a community and achieving things through this activity improves how we feel about ourselves and the communities in which we live. As well as gaining better wages and holidays joining a union will make you happier. Who could say no to that?
Across Europe the twin challenges of ageing populations and the recession caused by the financial crisis mean public sector reform is high on the political agenda.

France has moved quickly to make substantial changes to local government. They are reducing the number of regions from 22 to 13 and on January 1st 10 new city Regions were set up. Two more will follow a year later. It is claimed that this is the "first major reorganisation since Napoleon".

While the previous government also looked at reform the present government has moved quickly to implement change. The French President, Francois Hollande, claims this will save €12.2B. Local communes do continue to exist, the new city regions (Metropoles) provide a way for them to work together to provide services for the entire Metropole area. Over the next few years further powers will be devolved to these authorities. These include economic development, housing, water and skills. The three biggest cities will also gain powers over tourism, culture, agriculture and international relations. The two “super metropoles” which come into place next year are Grand Paris and Aix-Marseille-Provence. Grand Paris will include at least three of the current suburban departments and possibly more. It is hoped this will increase investment in these suburban areas.

The plans weren't universally welcomed when first announced, for example those in relatively rich Alsace didn't appear keen to merge with Lorraine, where the decline of steel and mining industries has had a severe impact on the economy. The plans for new regions were though passed in December so the merger will go ahead.

Interestingly while many in Scotland highlight the strengths of the localism of countries like France the French are actually are becoming more centralised. Still a long way from our increasingly centralised system though.

Local authorities are more effective in supporting people into work centrally driven programmes. Research by the National Institute for Economic and Social Research shows that local programmes using a wide range of interventions like advice and guidance, training, coaching and mentoring, work placements and apprenticeship have been very effective particularly in areas with high levels of deprivation. These are areas where national programmes have struggled.

Rather than competition services were brought together enabling a one stop shop approach. People tend to lead complex lives with multiple challenges so being able to connect a wide range of services makes a big difference. Local authorities are also able to use their links with employers developed through their long term role in economic development.

Individual support was also crucial: staff caseloads were small enough to ensure that clients could have intensive support and as there was no threat of loss of benefits participants were all volunteers.

Five main lessons from these projects
- any new service must link with existing provision
- councils have a particular role in helping those who are not claiming out of work benefits and are therefore usually not getting any support
- services need to address barriers to work like health and housing
- people who have been unemployed for a long period of time need services to be accessible, attractive, useful, flexible and provide one-one support
- services need to be linked to the needs of local employers to ensure that training matches jobs that are available in the local area

The research provides more backing for those, like UNISON, who want to see Job Centre Plus programmes and the funding devolved to local authorities.
